RESEARCH INTERESTS:

My current research concentrates on Cilicia and Isauria (i.e. Asia Minor north of Cyprus), addressing the question of what does it mean to be Roman in these areas. This question of identity can be addressed in many different ways. Although in literature Isaurians are a well-stereotyped ethnic grouping, with a clear identity (at least, as perceived by outsiders), how is this represented materially? And is Isauria significantly different in its material culture to other regions of the Roman Empire? These questions are addressed through the Göksu Archaeological Project, an interdisciplinary multi-period survey in the Taurus Mountains (www.biaatr.org/goksu). The five-year fieldwork was completed in 2006, followed by study seasons in 2007-2008, to be followed by publication. This project provides contextual information for a number of previously excavated sites (Alahan, Aloda, Dağpazarı) as well as recording low-lying areas threatened with flooding by a planned dam near Mut. Changes in regional culture are explored between the Paleolithic and the Ottoman periods, though focusing in particular on the fifth century AD, when a local, Zeno, became Roman emperor.

I am also writing a book on 'Cilicia and Rome in the Late Roman Empire. This work covers the third to seventh centuries AD and focuses on what it meant to Cilicia and Isauria to be a part of the Late Roman Empire. These consequences are discussed thematically, with chapters focusing on cities, the economy, the gods, the emperor, etc. There is no book-length study of this region in the Roman or Late Roman periods. Nor have late antique scholars focused much on the problems of 'Romanization'. Draft chapters have been favorably reviewed by OUP though no contract has yet been issued.

My first book, Warfare in Roman Europe: AD 350-425 (Oxford University Press, 1996; paperback 1998) examined the development and interaction of the military systems of Rome and her European enemies during the decline of the late Roman Empire. This produced several important conclusions, that the barbarian threat had little coherence, and that when compared with Roman forces, the military capacities of the barbarians were low and did not improve during this period. The problem of defining what it meant to be Roman was highlighted in the discussion of the 'barbarization' of the army, where it was shown that the recruitment of soldiers born outside the empire has been exaggerated in both its extent and impact. Relationships between Romans and non-Romans were also covered in my short monograph, Frontiers of the Roman Empire (published by Batsford and Indiana University Press, 1996; selection of the History Book Club in the US). Here, the Roman frontier was examined as a series of overlapping zones (civil, economic, and military) with attention paid to both sides of the border. By defining these various zones, it thus becomes easier to understand Roman identity. I have explored the same theme of identity in a number of prosopographical articles on Roman army officers in late antiquity (Fravitta, Illus) and on ethnicity (review article, Romania et Gothia; Nature of the Sixth-century Isaurians).

I have also focused on similar questions of definition in collaborative work. In 1989, with John Drinkwater, I organized an international conference on "Fifth-Century Gaul: A Crisis of Identity?", asking participants to assess the state of Romanization in Gaul in the fifth century AD. The proceedings were published by Cambridge University Press. I organized another focused international conference in 1997 with Gary Reger, titled "Regionalism in Hellenistic and Roman Asia Minor" at Trinity College, Connecticut. Here, we asked participants to examine the ways in which regions were defined in Asia Minor. The proceedings have been published by Ausonius Press, France. Last, I organized a panel at the 1999 APA Meeting, concerning 'Insiders and Outsiders in the Late Roman Empire'.

RECENT WORK EXPERIENCE:

I was Director of the British Institute at Ankara (BIAA) between August 2001 and August 2006. The position involved working with a wide range of researchers, mostly from UK universities, including geologists, historians, textual specialists, and anthropologists. Similarly, although the Institute is primarily concerned with Turkey, it also has strong interests in countries surrounding the Black Sea. The Director's position during this period was defined as 50% research, 50% administration. In Ankara, two major administrative responsibilities were to assist in drafting the Corporate Plan and Research Policy, and to help prepare the annual applications for funding to the British Academy. Other responsibilities were the day-to-day running of the Ankara office (local staff of four full-time and two part-time as well as a post-doctoral fellow and graduate researcher; annual budget of c. £80,000), handling queries from researchers, managing the library acquisitions process (annual budget, c. £20,000), building and staff safety, and determining and implementing IT policy. Frequent liaison with the Turkish archaeological authorities, the British Embassy, and the British Council taught me how to work effectively with high-level non-specialists. I was also part of the Research Committee which distributed the BIAA's research grants to researchers, and made recommendations regarding grants from the BIAA to Turkish academics. Both of these activities, as well as working with applicants for Institute grants have greatly improved my own grant writing skills. I also acted as a referee for the Institute's journal, Anatolian Studies. All these tasks required frequent contact with academics based in the UK and elsewhere.

I was also involved in three large additional projects beyond the usual functions of the Institute. The first was upgrading the library facilities and making the library catalogue web-accessible, thanks to a $75,000 grant from the Packard Humanities Institute. The second was helping to create and administer the British Academy Black Sea Initiative, a three year (2002-2005) interdisciplinary program designed to encourage British research in the Black Sea Region. The third was providing archaeological advice for the Baku-Tbilisi-Ceyhan pipeline. This $3.5 billion project involved 17 salvage excavations over 1,076 km of pipeline in Turkey. I was responsible for providing advice about current best international practice about the archaeology, Health and Safety, and capacity improvement for Turkish archaeologists. On-going consultancy work is focusing on timely publication. This involves working with the Environmental Impact Assessment team of BTC (the pipeline management company) as well as with Turkish archaeologists in both Ankara and the field. These projects enabled me to develop new skills (particularly in project management) and a wide range of professional contacts.

ARCHAEOLOGICAL EXPERIENCE:

Although my recent archaeological work has been concentrated in Turkey, I have a wide range of experience in other areas of the Mediterranean, as well as the UK and northern France, as shown below. Similarly, though my current project is a field survey, I have extensive excavation experience. Most recently this was at Zeugma, where I was responsible for Trench 2, a 20 x 40 m area containing several Roman houses. This involved managing a team of 7 archaeologists and 30 workmen, as well as liaising with conservators and managing an on-call machine.

The work in the Göksu (www.biaatr.org/goksu) has involved students from both the US and the UK. Techniques used on the survey include intensive-fieldwalking, extensive survey, magnetometry, satellite imagery, and GIS analysis of data in the field. In 2007, I was Field Director of the Avkat Project (joint Princeton-Birmingham UK-Freiburg) and in 2008 and 2009, I was Director. This interdisciplinary multi-period survey is focusing on an area north-east of Ankara near modern Çorum. Trent University provided a team of two faculty (including myself), 2 graduate students, and 5 undergraduates in 2008, 2 faculty, 3 graduate students and 8 undergraduates in 2009.

I have acted as a referee for SSHRC, NSF, Dumbarton Oaks, the Loeb Foundation, AHRC (British equivalent of the SSHRC/NEH), University of Western Ontario, National Geographic Society, and Royal Geographical Society research grant applications, for the periodicals American Journal of Archaeology, Anatolian Studies, Antiquity, Classical Quarterly, Journal of Late Antiquity, and Dumbarton Oaks Papers, and have reviewed book manuscripts for Oxford University Press (UK and US), California University Press, Oklahoma University Press, Blackwell, and Routledge. I have reviewed promotion cases to full professor for University of Nebraska and Trinity College, CT. At FIU, I served on the Departmental Undergraduate Committee (the steering committee for undergraduate affairs) and created an interdisciplinary Ancient Mediterranean Civilization Certificate Program which linked courses from History, Humanities, Philosophy, English and Religious Studies. At Trent, I received a merit award for Research and Service in fall 2009 and was nominated for the Symons award for teaching in 2011. In my capacity as Acting Dean of Arts + Science (Humanities) I have occasionally deputized for the Provost when he was unavailable, whether representing him in Emergency Management Exercise, Chairing the Academic Planning + Budget committee on his behalf or serving as Acting Provost when he is on vacation.
