International Development Studies (IDS) involves the comparative examination of the complexities of change in societies and cultures across the globe. Offering historical and critical perspectives on relations between the global north and south, the curriculum focuses on poverty, inequality, agrarian transformation, food, industrialization, the environment, gender, ethnicity, nationalism, human rights, migration, work, urbanization and resistance.

Career Conscious

International Development Studies graduates pursue careers in locations around the globe that require or benefit from an understanding of development in a global context. These include local and international activism, NGOs, law, government, international development agencies, research, business, teaching, journalism, medicine and film-making.
